Poet's Corner.

For the Spirit of the Age. Lines for Mrs. A.'s Album. BY REV. G. H. WELLS.

Tell me, ye winds, from od'rous islands blowing, Where nature laughs in ceaseless summer light; Where crystal streams o'er golden sands are flow-And brilliant day fades into radiant night; Have ye not found some island home, Where wearing care can never come? The zephyrs answered, with a sigh,

" 'Tis not beneath the sunny sky." Ye angel bands, whose silver pinions spreading, O'ershadow earth, and guard its sons from ill, And shield the path each erring mortal treading, While ye your God appointed stations fill; Have ye not found some resting place, Where grief and care can never need seluce?

Tell me, then moon, whose silver radiance beam

The angels answered, with a test,

"The rest you sigh for is not here."

Throws o'er the pensive heart such magic spell, So gently bright, that even angels dreaming Might long beneath thy soothing light to dwell-Is there no resting place below, Where sighs ne'er breathe and tears ne'er flow? She whispered, as she sadly smiled, "No resting place earth's erring child."

Tell me, my soul, thou restlese, panting spirit, Where wilt thou seek for rest, and love, and peace? Earth owns them not, no Eden we inherit, She hath no home where all is quiet ease. The winged winds sigh sadly, none, The guardian angels answer, none, The star-lit heaven, and earth, and air, Cry with a tear, "It is not here!"

Where, O, my soul, in search of Eden bowers, Where wilt thou fly to find thy mourned for rest? Wilt try again thy infant fledgling powers, Or wilt thou here give o'er thy Truitless quest? Nay, bark ! a voice from yonder star Comes quavering on the midnight air; The star of Jacob, hear it speak-"Hero, child of earth 'setbe rest you seek !"

God is thy rost, thy panting spirit seeking In earthly joys to quaff its raging thirst, Hath found it not, nor heard the God men speek-"Here, hadet thou sought, thou wouldst have found it first." God is thy rest, on him rely,

No longer weer, no longer sigh; Here bids thy sorrows ever cease.

Fireside Rending.

An Incident-Told as it Occurred.

"Have you anything for a poor blind man, ladies and gentlemen ?- anything for on blind man?". I turned round and beheld the disfigured face of the speaker, as he made his way through the cars under the gnidance of a lad of ten or eleven summers. There were great red gashes where his eyes should have been, and the lower part of his face was seamed with frightful scars. His clothes were mean and in tatters; but s ome kind hand had smoothed down the straggling hair, and laid his clean linen collar over his neck-tin neatly.

It was impossible to look upon that face without experiencing a feeling of genuine pity. One gentleman placed a piece of silver in his hand, then another, and another, until he stood opposite me, when a mid-dle-aged farmer, dressed in plain homespun, deposited a large piece of silver in the blind man's hand. I looked across at the farmer as I contributed my offering to the sightless supplicant for charity, thinking how I had been deceived in imagining him as close, cautious, calculating man of the world, for I had been observing him from the moment I entered the car, and I knew that he gave the money with his whole heart, for there could be no mistaking the look that accompanied it.

"That man ought to be at home, instead of begging here," said a well-dressed man, who occupied a front seat.

"Yes," added another passenger. "He ought either to be in a benevolent institution, or at home. The people hereabouts should keep their own poor.

"He has just as much right to travel as von or l," replied a gentleman beside me. poor people when I have the money to

"Well, if you lived in P-, there you would find enough to do with your money, my friend. You live in the country; you and I pay taxes for the support of these people; we are taxed to support benevolent institutions where men like that are well attended, and where they are much better off than they are jostling through crowds, and out among strangers."

The speaker was what the world generally calls a fine-looking man, with a head and chest that would grace a bank-note, and a smooth open face. I had heard him addressing a ragged news-boy a few moments after be entered the car, and before we started. The boy had cried his "three papers for a dime, sir," and my fine-looking man offered to take them at five cents, on condition that the news-boy would wash his face and comb his hair on the morrow, and attend Sunday School. "On no other .condition will I take them," said the man, in a pompous, half-patronizing way that disgusted me.

"I'm sore I can't see how any man could have the heart to turn that man away, even if there was a benevolent institution in every village in the land," rejoined a poorly dressed man scated near the farmer.

The latter nodded assent with a gratified amile, saying "De poor we hef always-we must do goot-I pay my tax, but I vant to do sometings more, and effery time I hef de chance it does me goot-makes me feel petter."

"Yes; but consider, my friend, that these people are often used by rascals to make money," urged the cautious gentleman, who was so thoughtful of his purse.

"Yes, dat may pe very true, dat may all pe; but I am not to plame for dat, so I do my duty, dat is all dat I must do. Dey may pe rascals," shaking his head deprecatingly, "Lut den I vant to saif my soul, and do vat I tink is right."

The calculating gentleman smiled a pitying smile; he was only thinking of his pocket. How I admired the genuine honesty of the German, who wanted to do something beside paying his tax, and who felt better after giving to the poor.

Happiness is a sober feeling of the mind. We should never, then, permit an idea that the great God is a severe, gloomy being, who delights in misery but habitually think of Him as the kindest friend we have, who admits us hovah delights to listen to the prayers of all His children; from the mouths of "babes and sucklings" he can perfect praise.
